

ATLANTA, GA, October 17, 2013 /24-7PressRelease/ -- The group facilitator company, FindaFacilitator, talks about the ways in which companies can make virtual meetings more effective and efficient. With the development of applications like Skype and GoToMeeting, people no longer need to be in the same room to see and hear one another. There is no doubting the benefits of these technologies, as they have given businesses everywhere the ability to reduce overhead expenditures and minimize time constraints. The professional facilitators say being able to conduct a corporate meeting via your smartphone is incredible to say the least, but there are a few tips that can help keep such interactions professional and productive.

A Skype Conference Should Never Replace the Real Thing

One of the main points the facilitators stress is to keep virtual meetings succinct. Unlike their traditional counterparts, it is much easier to get distracted and off course when you are staring at a computer monitor or tablet screen. The meeting facilitators recommend making online gatherings no longer than 10 minutes. If they need to run longer, it would be a good idea to break the meeting up into sections to prevent participants from getting off track.

According to Kris Casariego, Director of Marketing for Leadership Strategies, "A virtual meeting can be just as counterproductive as it can be beneficial. Regardless if the digital conference is among in-house staff or with clients, the subject matter should be kept appropriate and conducted in a timely fashion."
