

SARASOTA, Fla.--(BUSINESS WIRE)--Neutra Corp. (OTCBB: NTRR), a provider of all-natural wellness solutions, announced today that it's working to finalize a laboratory agreement to begin analyzing a simple, affordable new system for testing nutraceutical concentrates for harmful contaminants.

Led by Dr. Richard C. Kaufman, the company's new head of research and development in the $42 billion nutraceuticals industry, NTRR is developing a disposable system for testing oils, butters, tinctures, resins and other concentrates derived from medical marijuana (MMJ) for contaminants. Before releasing and marketing the product, however, NTRR must perform qualitative analysis to determine its efficacy under a variety of lab conditions.

"Obviously, it's crucial that we prove this system works before releasing it into the marketplace," said NTRR CEO Sydney Jim. "There's nothing like this on the market today, which is why we have such high expectations for its performance. Rigorous lab analysis is the first step toward making it easier than ever before to ensure safe, potent cannabinoid extractions for MMJ patients everywhere."

As hundreds of thousands of patients in approved markets turn to more efficient MMJ delivery methods, extractions such as butane hash oil, cannabutter, isohash and others are rapidly increasing in popularity. However, imperfect production of these tinctures and oils can pose significant health risks. Many cannabis oils, for example, are extracted using potentially harmful substances such as butane. NTRR is developing an easy, disposable test that will help nutraceutical users determine if their customized remedies are pure and free of contaminants.

By providing innovative nutraceutical products and services such as new MMJ breakthroughs, Neutra Corp. plans to follow in the footsteps of other successful public companies including Cannabis Science, Inc. (OTCBB: CBIS), Medical Marijuana Inc. (OTCBB: MJNA) and Terra Tech Corp. (OTCBB: TRTC), delivering technological advancements in the cultivation and processing of cannabis in approved markets.
