

CLEVELAND, OH, September 26, 2013 /24-7PressRelease/ -- In the past, inspiring writers such as Og Mandino, Napoleon Hill and others like them, empowered generations of readers to achieve their goals. It could be argued that today's young people face even greater challenges than previous generations. Today however, writers who can motivate and inspire are in short supply. Emeka Iwenofu hopes to change that. He teaches young readers, through engaging works of fiction, how to achieve their dreams.

While the teachers of yesterday have transformed the lives of many people, young people today may not be aware of those teachings. Emeka brings life-changing messages, filled with hope and promise, to the youth of today in ways that are engaging, transformative and powerful.

"I wrote this series," Iwenofu stated, "because I wanted to empower people from all walks of life that any and everything they truly want can be achieved through the proper thinking and attitude. There is no excuse for failure and everyone should eliminate the victim mentality, blaming outside circumstances for the problems. It's not the family you had, or the father you never knew, or the fancy school you never went to, or the abuse you went through as a child. Everything that has ever happened to you, came through your own thinking, but what's great, is that you can now correct it to suit your interests, which these books are designed to do through the characters in the story."

'Francine's Miracle', Iwenofu's latest work, features miraculous stories that teach young people how to achieve their dreams. Parents will appreciate the book as it empowers parents and grandparents to help children achieve their goals. Educators will find the messages in 'Francine's Miracle' to be uplifting, inspiring, appropriate for class projects and a powerful teaching tool. Children will find the book to be a down to earth, honest, entertaining tale that will allow them to see a troubled person's success story unfold step by step.

"Parents, grandparents, educators and young readers will enjoy these books," Iwenofu continued, "because they will provide to them universal laws and applications to attaining success in life that is backed by historical data to prove principles that are real, been tested, and do work for anyone in any given situation that they're in provided they follow it from which change will appear in their life."

All of his works are available at most online book outlets including Amazon and Barnes and Noble. More information is available at the website.

Emeka Iwenofu lives in Cleveland where he attended Cuyahoga Community College before transferring to Cleveland State University where he earned his degree in Accounting. He eventually found his true calling as a writer.

He was inspired to write the three book series he calls 'The Miracle Trilogy'.

Virtually all the material contained within his books are techniques he endorses and continues to model in his daily life as the fundamental principles needed for anyone to achieve success in life. He sincerely hopes that reader's lives can be changed for the better, enriching both their lives and others around them.
