

Curt Kramer Believes Governmental Shutdown Will Have Minimal Effect on Economy

Written by Australian Business

FORT WORTH, TX, October 03, 2013 /24-7PressRelease/ -- Curt Kramer is urging those in the investments industry to rethink making any major moves as a result of the potential government shutdown. He is among many in the investments and financial industry who believe that the situation will have no real lasting impact, either on the government or the economy.

The nation is preparing for this possible shutdown of government as Republicans make a last-ditch effort to protest the Affordable Care Act, informally known as ObamaCare, before it rolls out on January 1, 2014. One of the major areas of concern is how this potential shutdown could affect the nation. However, Curt Kramer is not alone in believing the situation to be show and little else. There has been little evidence to indicate that the financial industry is concerned about the impending governmental "shut down".

Though stocks have fallen slightly, the Dow still remains just 2.7 percent below the record high. According to Curt Kramer, this is a clear sign that most in the financial industry regard the situation as "theatrics" and little else, indicating that the situation currently playing out will have no more effect than other similar situations that have played out in Washington, D. C. in the past.

However, despite the lack of indication that the situation could have any lasting effect, there are still many investors who are concerned about potential financial risks should there be any crisis surrounding the situation in the nation's capitol. Many investors have eased back on their spending - however, that could do more harm than good, Curt Kramer warns.

However, even where there is some concern, it remains relatively subdued, and many investors are taking advantage of lowered stock prices to invest before prices edge up again, as they likely will after the situation is ended. Government shutdowns have not been shown in the past to affect the market negatively, and in some cases they have actually helped the market, though only by a marginal amount. Regardless, fears about potential dangers associated with the shutdown are largely abating, even ahead of a financial decision being made in the nation's capitol.

Curt Kramer advises investors who remain concerned about the potential government shutdown that though there is some risk associated with this situation, there is still strong potential for growth. Nontraditional investments may be the way to go for many individuals and small businesses in the wake of this crisis, he suggests, so now is a good time for them to explore other options and to see what is available to them.

If the shutdown occurs, it is likely that it will be brief in scope. Analysts predict a quick resolution to the situation, and the continuation of overall market growth. There is no definitive answer as to how this situation will effect the market in the end, but overall it largely seems that it will have no effect on it at all, either for the good or for the bad, apart from a moderate amount of tension.
