said the chief executive in

Saint Petersburg

after the closing of the G20 summit.

According to a number of polls, a majority of the people of the U.S. are opposed to a new military adventure, worried about the repercussions this could have on the national economy and on the stability of the complex region of the Middle East.

The escalation in Syria took up a great deal of the G20 Summit. The leaders in attendance there were in agreement that chemical weapons had been used, and the majority believe that President Bashar al Assad was responsible, Obama affirmed.

"There are times where we have to make hard choices," the President noted, and gave assurances that he will continue to seek the support of Congress and international allies for a military strike on Syria.
