

TORONTO, Oct. 10, 2013 /CNW/ -

FEATURES

Intern's response to in-house plagiarism at Toronto Star called "courageous" Toronto Star's summer intern Marc Ellison worked on a data journalism project with a searchable database of banned licence plates. But he used some three-year-old material from Daniel Dale, another Star's reporter, without attribution. His blog post explaining his actions has been called "courageous" for his willingness to admit how and why he went wrong.

Pacific Newspaper Group wants to "reset" image for readers and employees Recently, The Province's and the Vancouver Sun's have been in the news for the "wrong reasons," says the former's editor-in-chief

Wayne Moriarty

. In response, Pacific News Group has launched Project Reset to reassure both employees and readers that the two brands are very much here to stay. Associate editor

Tamara Baluja

reports.

What would a national press council look like? With Newspapers Canada exploring the idea of establishing a national press council,

Eric

Mark Do

takes a look at the Irish, Swedish and Danish models to see what Canada can learn from these international examples.

Book Review: Guerilla Nation brings to life the challenges faced by the first western journalist reporting from North Vietnam Michael Maclear is not as well-known as he should be, writes D avid Common

, host of CBC's

World Report

, in this review of the journalist's latest book,

Guerilla Nation.

But that's a shame, he says, because Maclear's tales of North Vietnam

, as well as his struggles with

Canada's

public broadcaster, are riveting.

20 years out of j-school: Comparing journalism past and present Twenty years ago, field notes editor

Nicole Blanchett

Neheli

graduated from

Ryerson University's

journalism program. News practice has changed remarkably between now and then. Following the 60

th

anniversary of the journalism school, she looks at the past, present and future of an industry trying to grapple with a rapidly changing media landscape and lots of uncharted territory.

IN THE NEWS

EVENTS CALENDAR

J-Source and ProjeTJ are projects of the Canadian Journalism Foundation in collaboration with leading journalism schools and organizations.

CJF J-Talk: Join Linwood Barclay, the former Toronto Star humour columnist turned author of suspense novels, and Lisa

Gabriele

, the former showrunner at CBC's

Dragons' Den

who found success with an erotic novel first published under a pseudonym (now turned into a trilogy), as they discuss the journey from journalist to bestselling author with

The Globe and Mail'

s Books editor

Jared Bland

. For tickets, visit our

J-Talks

page.

SOURCE Canadian Journalism Foundation